

Burial Vault Selection Guide

What a burial vault is, what each one is made of, and what it costs.

UNDERSTANDING BURIAL VAULTS

What Is a Burial Vault?

A burial vault is a lined, sealed container that the casket goes into. It carries the weight of the earth above it and of the mowers and backhoes that pass over the grave, and it keeps water out. It is also what stops the ground settling into a dip over the grave, which is why the cemetery asks for one.

The vault is one of several charges beyond the cemetery space itself. The Cemetery Property Guide explains how it fits with the space, opening and closing, endowment care, and the rest.

They are made of high-strength concrete with a metal or plastic liner inside. That is as much as you can do to protect a casket in the ground.

Lined & Sealed Vault
Full protection

If it isn't lined and sealed, it isn't a burial vault.

The other thing you'll hear about is an outer burial container, sometimes called a gravebox. That's a plain concrete box with drainage holes in it, so ground water runs straight through. It holds the ground up, but it doesn't keep water out, and it isn't lined or sealed. That's the whole difference between the two.

UNDERSTANDING PROTECTION

Three Levels of Vault Construction

There are three levels. All three are reinforced concrete. What changes between them is what the concrete is lined with on the inside and covered with on the outside.

PREMIUM

Bronze or Copper Lined

Reinforced concrete inside a bronze or copper shell, with a metal liner inside that.

TRIUNE

Metal-Lined Concrete

Reinforced concrete with a liner of stainless steel, copper or bronze inside it.

STANDARD

Reinforced Concrete

Reinforced concrete with a textured outer shell. No metal liner.

PREMIUM PROTECTION

The Wilbert Bronze

Wilbert's top-of-the-line vault: solid bronze over reinforced concrete.
